to Be

> to be (something) any-thing opposes the insignificant creatures we are: though we all aspire to greatness, the vast majority count as nothing.

we are taught from the cradle to be something though all the while the underlying discourse insists we remain insignificant little slaves, frightened, cringing, compliant and obedient to the dominant voice.

i wondered how it would feel to be free, really FREE of those implanted sentries that pace the boundaries of the mind guarding areas not to be transgressed; demarcations etched by foreign design.

i recall the moment i decided that 'living' in a mapped social space, not of my design, was no 'life' at all and regardless of cost i would break free of false propriety and other habitual formalities.

i slowly began to embrace raw Existence without Gods, drugs, excessive stimulation and other distractions (negations) just me, naked, terrified and vulnerable, confronting the magnificence of Existence.

i watched myself writhe and contort in horror from withdrawals as each crutch was kicked, abandoned until all my social comforters were gone.

eventually i became myself someone i had never known previously; liberated, standing easy, strong, without supports. i am now viewed with suspicion, considered dangerous and subversive, an enemy of the State ${\mathord{\text{-}}}$

it seems it was never intended that we remove our shackles and taste the exhilarating joys of Freedom.
