Talisman

a bleeding moon and crying sun is all u left me solarised scenes from hell fill my mind with wonder and dread; incongruous colours, crimson grass, indigo skies spinning thru my brain loosening my mind strange sights but familiar scents, olfactory déjà vu.

i am ready, like a blindfolded neophyte for another initiation thru the fires of hell until i emerge stronger, tempered like fine steel but steel does not easily handle butterflies without damaging fragile wings or causing more serious harm i would rather be the innocent youth of my past unblemished, easily hurt but ever so sensitive -i could commune with spirits in those days.

the involuntary price i pay each time i am crucified, is to be reborn a little tougher, harder than before -fine steel makes superior swords and weapons for which i have no use yet every injustice, cruelty and hurt hardens and prepares me for the next assault.

i have but one defence my verse poetic meanderings that maintain my sensitivity and humanity.

i must write
frenetically lest
i turn to stone,
a petrified simulacrum of myself
frozen
lacking a heart,
a granite prison of the soul.

we should think twice before trampling another's emotions we may inadvertently create a race of heartless, uniformed killers that suicide after laying waste to everything around them.

i am ready for the fires of hell and the ice of damnation/desolation but i harbour a secret i have constructed a raft of verse to safely span the black seas of the abyss

i will emerge intact making a ruin of treachery and You.
