

Luminaries

the sun is not timid
or unsure
it is the moon
that waxes and wanes,
as though unsure of itself,
always appearing
and disappearing indecisive of its bearing in the sky

not so the sun's
steady journey,
chasing the night
and heralding the day
always vanquishing the dark

the sun moves steadily as it transits the sky blazing above the clouds imploding and exploding, a life-giving fiery furnace

the pale
cool,
uncertain moon
knows better than to attempt to match the sun, it remains hidden
safe, in the soft night sky accepting only indirect rays to bathe its desolation

yet the heavens would be incomplete if either celestial body lacked its counterpart the steadfastness of a man must be softened by the uncertainty of a woman;

the singular progress of the sun must be complimented by the perpetual shifting of the moon one forever seeks the other yet both remain separated by the cruel harmony

and motions
of the firmament --

it seems at times that the entire universe
works to prevent conjugation.
